

have a strategy around AI, investments are still low.

"AI is a boardroom topic but the real ability of a CXO (senior corporate executive) is to think what it means for his or her business and what should be the strategy around AI," said Rohini Srivathsa, National Technology Officer at Microsoft. On the issue of replacing jobs, the study found 16 per cent business leaders think AI will create jobs and 18 per cent felt the technology will replace workers.

Workers were more optimistic, with only 4 per cent expecting AI to replace jobs, and 21 per cent said it will create employment.

At the same time, 12 per cent of workers expect no impact to their jobs in three years from now.

"Everyone believes that AI will augment the work scenario. Around 64 per cent business leaders believe AI will augment jobs and 63 per
